A Reflective look

This project has had many ups and downs for me. The whole concept of this project is a huge problem for me. Creative is something that is foreign to me. I don’t really have that creative component that many people have. I had to evaluate the options and recommendations that were on the rubric and see if there was anything that would fit me in those options. I saw the options for songs, and making some sort of artistic project, but that’s not really me. Unfortunately, the only option that I saw that would be viable for me was the research paper. I’m not a fan of papers, but it seemed like the only thing that I thought I could manage. So then the next problem hit me after that. What was I going to do the project over?

Initially I thought I was going to do my project over women and their involvement in literature. I thought this would be great, because my roommate Chris suggested that I could do a pamphlet. After he offered this idea, I figured I would put examples of woman’s stereotypes in the pamphlet and have a PowerPoint to discuss the changes that it had on the literature at the time. At the time it sounded like a fantastic idea. However, when I went to write about this topic I was drawing blanks. I could figure out how I was going to prove a relationship between the stereotypes of women and the effect that it had on literature at the time. I think my biggest concern was how to research this topic. I didn’t know where to search to find the answers, or what questions to ask to find the answers. So after a few hours of frustration and no results, I decided that I may have to find a new topic.
